Chris Dyer. The precursors of academic local history can be found in the antiquarian accounts of the English counties and towns which began with Lambarde's Kent, Carew's Cornwall and Stow's London in the 16th century, (1) and Burton's Leicestershire and Dugdale's Warwickshire in the 17th. (2) They evolved from attempts to characterise a whole county, to parish by parish studies, in which the lords of the manor were identified, and the church and its monuments described.

Local historians, wrote John Ives in 1772, ‘are no longer represented as men of uncultivated minds, fit only to pore over musty records, or grovel amongst ruined walls; and their accounts are no longer considered the dull effusions of pedantry or the verbose disquisitions of folly’. [1] Ives’ comment reflects the enormous popularity of writing – and reading – local history during the 18th century.
