Drawn thread work is a counted-thread form of whitework embroidery thought to originate in Egypt, in which specific threads of the warp (running vertically) and weft (running horizontally) of a backing fabric are cut and drawn out, with the remaining threads stitched together to create intricate patterns. Often used in combination with cutwork, pulled threadwork and/or needlelace, this style was extremely popular for embellishing the borders of table linens and underclothes in the 16th century.
