Answered May 24, 2014 · Author has 180 answers and 268.1K answer views. Social history and cultural history are two ways of doing history that became popular during the later 20th century, and are still used today, although not as much as they were at first. Social history is often statistics based, and owes a lot to economics - social historians would look at census data, parish records, employment information, and so on, and pull together all of this data to find out, for example, what ...

Cultural history. Cultural history is not simply the study of high culture or alternatively of peoples' past rituals. It is best characterised as an approach which considers the domain of representation and the struggle over meaning as the most fruitful areas for the pursuit of historical understanding. In its modern form it evolved to a certain extent out of the 'new' social, economic and women's histories of the 1960s and 1970s, which sought to understand the lives of non-elites and women ...
