The Status Of Customary International

Customary international law is an aspect of international law involving the principle of custom. Along with general principles of law and treaties, custom is considered by the International Court of Justice, jurists, the United Nations, and its member states to be among the primary sources of international law. Many governments accept in principle the existence of customary international law, although there are differing opinions as to what rules are contained in it. In 1950, the International L

Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice lists "international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law," or in short customary international law (CIL), as one of the three principal sources of international law. 1 In recent years the International Law Association (ILA) and International Law Commission (ILC) have undertaken the task of clarifying rules concerning the formation and identification of CIL.

Customary International Law: A Third World Perspective

Perhaps the field where this rings most true is that of 'customary international law'. Despite appearing in treaties, international court decisions, and United Nations resolutions (and in fact being older than the United Nations itself), customary international law is a concept rarely discussed in mainstream public discourse. Yet it has profound consequences for the international rule of law.
