Meat : A Benign Extravagance by Simon Fairlie (2010, Trade ...

Fairlie shows us that meat production in essence is a secondary function of holistic farming: a gift of land, and is at the very worst, a "benign extravagance". While Fairlie tackles the most inflated arguments against meat production, his strongest critique is reserved for industrial agriculture, which leverages the use of petroleum to produce a kind of meat that is by any measure non-sustainable.

Meat: A Benign Extravagance may only bruise veganism, but it's a bruise that will not soon heal. His fair treatment of veganism has more to do with intellectual honesty than admiration; it would be wrong to say that Fairlie regards the vegan ethic as positive, harmless or irrelevant. If he thought that, he wouldn't have engaged it so much.
