The Post Soviet Potemkin Village

The end result was a facade of private ownership: a Potemkin village for the post-Soviet era. Far from creating private property that would bring development to the post-Soviet rural heartland, privatization policy deprived former collective farm members of their few remaining rights and ushered in a new era of state control over land resources.

Like the wooden facades that, according to legend, were constructed along Crimean roads to impress and mislead Tsarina Catherine the Great during her travels at the end of the eighteenth century, post-Soviet Potemkin villages convinced Moscow and Kyiv of local state officials' loyalty and international lending institutions of the Russian and Ukrainian governments' commitment to property ...

The post-soviet potemkin village

The reverse process, privatizing land to kolchoz workers in Russia and the Ukraine in the 1990s, has in curious contrast attracted almost no attention. This unique and interesting academic study shows how it was done, what went wrong, and how most of the process in crisis conditions was sabotaged by kolchoz chiefs and agricultural apparatschiks.
