Food - its cultivation, preparation and communal consumption - has long been considered a form of cultural heritage. A dynamic, living product, food creates social bonds as it simultaneously marks off and maintains cultural difference. In bringing together anthropologists, historians and other scholars of food and heritage, this volume closely examines the ways in which the cultivation, preparation, and consumption of food is used to create identity claims of 'cultural heritage' on local, ...

Although the relationship between food and social and cultural identities is not precisely new as an anthropological research theme, the volume’s contribution to the understanding of emerging “edible identities” is situated and actualized within the context of the modernity of food and food consumption, and therefore provides important insights into one of the major practices that currently reframe the above relationship: heritage-making.
