Art And Politics In China

The relationship between art and politics in China has not followed a set pattern and is, therefore, approached in the thesis as being characterised by constant changes. These changes have been contingent mainly on social-political considerations, but also on the response of artists to the political constraints imposed upon them.

Art and Politics in China, 1949-1986

The central argument submitted in the thesis is that art in the People's Republic of China should be seen as an image of social reality. The argument is pursued by a method which seeks to relate art to social-political settings, and to explore not only the aesthetic dimension of artistic work, but also the political discourse embodied in it.
