An ordinary differential equation (ODE) is an equation containing an unknown function of one real or complex variable  $x$ , its derivatives, and some given functions of  $x$ . The unknown function is generally represented by a variable (often denoted  $y$ ), which, therefore, depends on  $x$ . Thus  $x$  is often called the independent variable of the equation. The term "ordinary" is used in contrast with the term ...

A zeroth-order reaction is one whose rate is independent of concentration; its differential rate law is  $\text{rate} = k$ . We refer to these reactions as zeroth order because we could also write their rate in a form such that the exponent of the reactant in the rate law is 0:  $\text{rate} = -\Delta[A] / \Delta t = k[\text{reactant}]^0 = k(1) = k$ .

Reaction calorimetry Calorimetry may be used to monitor the course of a reaction, since the instantaneous heat flux of the reaction, which is directly related to the enthalpy change for the reaction, is monitored. Reaction calorimetry may be classified as a differential technique since the primary data collected are proportional to rate vs. time.

From these assumptions, and equilibrium reactions, we can write down a number of differential equations which give us a very useful and quite accurate equation. The differential equations one can write down abide by the law of mass-action, which basically just says if we write down all the places some mass can go, then we can know the rate of change for a particular step.

By doing experiments involving a reaction between A and B, you would find that the rate of the reaction was related to the concentrations of A and B in this way: This is called the rate equation for the reaction. The concentrations of A and B have to be raised to some power to show how they affect the rate of the reaction.

ORDERS OF REACTION AND RATE EQUATIONS

The ordinary rate law (more precisely known as the instantaneous or differential rate law) tells us how the rate of a reaction depends on the concentrations of the reactants. But for many practical purposes, it is more important to know how the concentrations of reactants (and of products) change with time.
